Shotguns and shells are commonly used to harvest game animals such as deer. Shotgun hunting is more enjoyable than rifle hunting because the person hunting gets closer to the game. But it is not a totally hands-off experience. A hunter must be in the vicinity to operate a shotgun, and must be able to hear and see game in proximity to the shotgun. Additionally, game animals move quickly and a hunter must be ready to move quickly himself or herself. Therefore, there is a need for a blind (or other improved position) that is safely located from a hunting area and in which a hunter can sit comfortably. U.S. Pat. No. 5,211,326 (Fehrer) discloses a deer blind which has a seat and a gun rack on the back of the seat. The gun rack has a plurality of horizontally disposed supports arranged around the periphery of a circular blind. The supports have a plurality of holes through which the supports can be secured to an underlying support, and the blind is removable from the supports by lifting the blind and removing it from the supports. The blind is then lifted and deposited on the ground. In a preferred embodiment the blind is a tube with a circular top, and it is supported on four flat horizontal supports. One support is centrally located under the blind and rests on a surface. The other three supports extend upwardly and have rounded tops that are positioned under the blind so that when the blind is in a position in which the top of the blind is slightly above the height of the supports on the back of the seat, the three supports of the blind are firmly seated in the supports. The supports extend downwardly away from the seat from approximately 11 inches to 24 inches. The height of the blind above the level of the supports is about 6 to about 13 inches. The ""326 device suffers from several disadvantages. The three middle supports of the ""326 device are necessarily larger than the three top supports, so the three middle supports are not as stable as the three top supports. Additionally, the ""326 device is inconvenient to use. A hunter must sit down and remove the blind from the supports. There is a considerable risk that the supports will not be stable, but will be tilted and become unstable, resulting in the hunter losing his balance and possibly falling from the blind. The primary motivation for hunters and target shooters, to remain comfortable, is to avoid moving. But the hunter must lift the blind and then depart the hunting area to deposit it on the ground. Further, the supports of
