system of the endocytic pathway. In addition to the serum-derived acidic proteins, there is increasing evidence that membrane proteins also play a significant role in determining the endothelial permeability to macromolecules \[@B37\]. In addition, it is conceivable that albumin passes through the basal membrane of the endothelial cells by vesicular system and becomes integrated into the extracellular matrix \[@B38\]. Our results clearly demonstrated that albumin was localized to the sub-apical region. By using TEM and immunofluorescence microscopy, our results suggested that albumin permeates the basolateral membrane of LLC-PK1 cells via macropinocytosis or endocytosis and then is transported to the cytoplasm in vesicular system, but does not enter directly from the cell surface. Although albumin is found to be quite rapidly and extensively incorporated by the bovine aortic endothelial cell, the intracellular trafficking of albumin was shown to be less extensive \[@B39\]. In addition, in comparison to the albumin entering human fibroblasts, the limited albumin uptake by the
